They have no use for tooth brushes, they have no use for toothpicks or any of these affairs for artificial cleaning. Such mouths are practically perfect; the health of the person is generally good, there is immunity from decay and they go along, possibly through life, without any need for artificial cleaning. There are no deposits from the saliva of these persons, their saliva is thin and watery and seems to dissolve and remove the last trace of debris. But such perfect conditions are the exception to the rule. The Tooth Brush. Most persons need to use the tooth brush, and it becomes the duty of the dentist to prescribe the manner of its use; not only to prescribe the manner of use, but to teach his patients the correct use of the brush. Nearly every person who uses the brush will fall into certain fixed habits. Some will take the brush and make a few strokes in this direction or that, and are done. They have brushed their teeth, and they will tell you very conscientiously that they have brushed them carefully. Others will use the brush vigorously. They form the habit of going through certain motions. An examination will show the cleaning to be very imperfect in that certain parts are missed and not cleaned at all. Make it a rule to say to little patients, The next time...
