Not illustrated. 1856 Excerpt: . . . the rollers, and the threads must be wound upon the spindles. This is the order of movements which belong to the mule. It has been shown how the rotation of the spindles is produced. For winding-on the yarn the carriage has a peculiar apparatus, which we shall now describe. In front of it, through the whole extent to the right hand as well as the left, a slender iron rod, d, runs horizontally along, in a line somewhat higher than the middle of the coping portion of the spindles, and is supported by several props, such as a j e. Upon each end of the two rods, ds, there is an arm, g5; and betwixt these arms an iron wire, called the coping wire, s, is stretched, parallel with the rod f c. For the support of this wire, there are several slender bent arms As extended from the rod f at several points betwixt the straight arms g. The rod d5 has, besides, a wooden handle at the place opposite to where the spinner stands, by which it can be readily grasped. This movement is applied at the left division of the machine, and it is communicated to the right by an apparatus which resembles a crane's bill. The two arms, g, in the middle of the machine, project over the rods f c, and are connected by hinges with two vertical rods, which hang together downwards in like manner with two arms f c, proceeding from a horizontal axis...
