Not illustrated. 1889 Excerpt: . . . who has frequently ami earnestly presented to us many new and valuable suggestions and practical methods, there has been a steady and satisfactory advance in a large majority of the schools, a few having improved at least 100 percent. , only three or four having made but little progress, and but one having made no perceptible change for the better. While there has been the usual advance in all of the subjects taught in the schools, I wish to make special mention of the great progress observable in language and arithmetic. The children in all the grades, and especially in the lower classes, have a better knowledge of the use of language and can express themselves in better English than heretofore, while technical grammar has by no means been neglected. Composition has been rendered easy, being taught intelligently and from a knowledge of its underlying principles,...
